Droughts are one of the very common natural calamities in India. The term 'drought' is applied to an extended period when there is a shortage of water availability, due to inadequate rains, high evaporation and over-use of available water. There are many types of droughts.

First is the meteorological drought, which is a situation when there is a prolonged period of inadequate rainfall which is unequally distributed.

Second type is the agricultural drought; it is also known as the soil moisture drought. This is characterised by low soil moisture which is essential for the crop growth. This type of drought results in crop failures.

Hydrological drought is the third type of drought, which occurs due to the unavailability of water in different sources like lakes, reservoirs, rivers, etc. The last type of drought is the ecological drought. Such type of drought occurs when the ecosystem fails due to shortage of water leading to the damage of the ecosystem.
